Q: Who needs an advance directive?

Everyone 18 and older should have an advance directive. Serious illness or injury can occur at any time and prevent you from communicating your wishes for medical care.

Q: What documents are in an advance directive?

They include a health care directive, often called a “living will,” and a durable power of attorney for health care. The living will spells out what kind of medical care you would want. A durable power of attorney gives an agent/advocate of your choosing the power to act on your behalf.

Q: When is an advance directive used?

An advance directive is used only when you are unable to make medical decisions for yourself. The person you appoint to act on your behalf would use the health care directive to make sure your medical wishes are honored and make related decisions.

Starting the conversation...

You don't need to have the conversation yet. It's okay to just start thinking about it.

You can start out by writing a letter to yourself, a loved one or a friend.

Advance care planning involves discussions with your family, loved ones and doctor about:

- Your health care goals.
- The kind of care and treatment you want.
- Your personal benefits and values and how they relate to your health care wishes.
- Who you want to make decisions on your behalf if you cannot make decisions yourself.

Having the conversation may reveal that you and your loved ones disagree. That's okay. It's important to simply know this, and to continue talking about it now - not in a medical crisis.

Having the conversation is not just a one-time thing. It is the first in a series of conversations over time.

Already have an advance directive?

- Is your healthcare agent/advocate still available to make decisions on your behalf?
- Are your previous healthcare choices still right for you?
- Does your healthcare provider have a copy?
- One common myth about advance directives is that once it is complete, you cannot change it. Ongoing conversations and revision of your advance directive based on your current wishes and health needs is an encouraged practice and we are here to help.
